Artist Biographies:

Gary Myrick is a nationally recognized courtroom artist. Since 1976, his sketches of major trials have appeared on virtually all major television news outlets, nationally and worldwide. Feature articles about his career and work have appeared in The New York Times, Texas Monthly and many other publications. In 2014, his archive was obtained by the Library of Congress for its permanent collection.

Vicki Behrenger has been an internationally known courtroom artist for the last 26 years. Based out of Northern California, Vicki’s most infamous trials were Michael Jackson, Scott Peterson, the Unabomber, Barry Bonds, and more recently, Apple v. Samsung. Her sketches from these trials and many more are available for sale, and are sought after by collectors. Vicki’s career has been featured many times in the media, including Forbes Magazine, USA Today, and NPR. In addition to sketching for print and broadcast media worldwide, Vicki is often commissioned to sketch in courtrooms for professional & personal use.

2016: A Watershed Year in our Fight for Fairness

For 95 years, the work of San Francisco’s public defenders has been motivated by a simple belief—that justice should not depend on the color of your skin or the size of your wallet.

We kicked off 2016 by taking on the predatory money bail system. Partnering with Equal Justice Under Law, two of our clients launched a federal civil rights lawsuit to abolish money bail in favor of pretrial supervision.

We are now on the verge of a better way—one based on community safety and due process rather than the income of the accused. On Nov. 1, the San Francisco City Attorney announced he would not defend the unconstitutional money bail system. Until it is abolished, our Bail Team fights to release low-risk clients awaiting trial and reduce racial disparities in jail.

Fighting bigotry continued to be our focus in 2016. Because we believe sunlight is the best disinfectant, we exposed police misconduct, including racist and homophobic text messages sent between officers and a case of officer perjury that threatened to send an innocent man to jail. Our Racial Justice Committee helped draft policy surrounding the use of police body cameras. Professor, author and television personality Melissa Harris-Perry delivered the keynote address at our annual Justice Summit, focusing on implicit bias and solutions to racial profiling.

Today, we are leading the charge to provide legal representation to every San Franciscan facing deportation. We believe the most effective way to keep immigrants safe is to arm them with lawyers. Studies show detainees with attorneys are six times more likely to win their immigration cases than those without legal representation.

Our accomplishments are detailed in the 2016 Annual Report and 2017 calendar, which features the vanishing art of courtroom sketching. Talented artists Gary Myrick and Vicki Behringer captured the emotion of our trials, jail visits, field investigations and community celebrations.

The report, which was not printed at public expense, is a transparent look at our year-end numbers. How do they add up? It is clear that in 2016, going to trial paid off. Approximately 84 percent of our felony clients who chose to go to trial received a better outcome than if they had accepted the prosecution’s plea offer.

But our fight for justice didn’t end in the courtroom. Our community MAGIC programs handed out more than 4,000 backpacks stuffed with school supplies to youth in the Bayview and Western Addition, provided literacy programs for kids, and nurtured leadership potential in high school students. Our Juvenile Unit kept our young clients in school and out of custody. And our social workers, investigators, paralegals and clerical staff provided holistic representation to thousands.

We are honored to advocate for you. In 2017, we will continue to fight for due process and equal justice for all San Franciscans.

Sincerely,

Jeff Adachi
San Francisco Public Defender
Defending Against Deportation

San Francisco has long been a welcoming city for immigrants. However, the 2016 presidential election outcome left many city residents fearful of deportation. Public defenders believe all people deserve due process, and that’s why we are fighting for legal representation for San Franciscans in deportation detention. Evidence backs up our plan: immigrants with lawyers are six times more likely to win the right to stay in the country than immigrants representing themselves.

Meeting your Advocate at Arraignment

Standing before the court to hear the charges against you can be terrifying. Often, your career, housing, and custody of your children are at stake. Sometimes the accusations are inflated—or just plain wrong. Enter the public defender (like Tenette Smith, pictured): an advocate who will stand up for you even at your lowest point.

Investigation: Catching Clues Overlooked By Cops

When our office receives a case, it is assigned to both a public defender and a public defense investigator (like Tim Kingston, left.) These sleuths test the veracity of the “official” version of events put forth by police officers, which means scouring surveillance footage, tracking down witnesses, and poring over digital databases.

Defending Your Right to an Unbiased Jury

Voir Dire is the first and most important step public defenders take to ensure an impartial jury for their clients. The term originally referred to an honesty oath taken by jurors (from the Latin verum dicere, to say what is true.) Today, public defenders such as Sierra Villaran (left) use voir dire to delve more deeply into a potential juror’s views in order to weed out biased or disinterested people.
Rehabilitation Over Incarceration for Youth

The San Francisco Public Defender’s Juvenile Unit stands as a national model of rehabilitation and innovation. Juvenile public defenders like Sujung Kim (pictured) have changed the lives of countless youth in San Francisco through zealous advocacy. The unit pioneered the use of social workers to mend families and educational attorneys to advocate for young clients in the classroom. As a result, youth in San Francisco are less likely to be sent to state lock-up than their peers in any other part of the state.

San Francisco public defenders (like Sliman Nawabi, above) don’t just fight for their clients in the courtroom; they also address their clients’ underlying needs that fueled their involvement in the criminal justice system. Attorneys honor their clients’ input and goals when planning their defense. Social workers connect clients with resources around mental health, addiction, housing, employment and education.

Justice Summit: Use of Force

With the city poised at a critical moment in criminal justice reform, the San Francisco Public Defender’s 2016 Justice Summit focused on the use of force.

The annual event, held at the San Francisco Main Library’s Koret Auditorium, featured author, professor and political commentator Melissa Harris-Perry as keynote speaker. Described by Ta-Nehisi Coates as “America’s foremost public intellectual,” Harris-Perry is a social scientist and former MSNBC host known for her scholarly research and provocative conversations around politics, race and gender.

The forum drew an audience of 300 attorneys, community members and city leaders. Ken E. Williams, a former Boston-area homicide inspector and use of force expert, analyzed the city’s officer-involved shootings, including the deaths of Mario Woods, Alex Nieto, and Luis Gongora. A spirited afternoon discussion explored the pros and cons of arming San Francisco police officers with Tasers.

You can watch the San Francisco Public Defender’s 2016 Justice Summit on our YouTube channel at youtube.com/sfpublicdefender.

Major Cases Need Extraordinary Lawyers

The stakes are never higher than in a murder trial. The San Francisco Public Defender’s Felony Unit took six murder cases to trial in 2016 and in each completed case secured an outcome more favorable than the prosecutor’s pre-trial offer. Here, Deputy Public Defender Sangeeta Sinha cross examines a witness in a fatal shooting in the Bayview. Attorneys keep their skills sharp with in-house trainings and trial practice groups.

Eyewitness Identification: Powerful but Often Mistaken

Eyewitness misidentification is the greatest cause of wrongful conviction. The Innocence Project estimates that as many as 1 in 4 stranger eyewitness identifications are wrong. Trauma warps memories and the brain tends to reconstruct incidents by “filling in” things it missed. Police and prosecutors sometimes use suggestive lineup techniques that sway the results. That’s why public defenders like Azita Ghafourpour (pictured) ask witnesses to recall their exact location and circumstances at the time of the alleged crime. This case, a felony gun possession trial, ended in an acquittal.

The San Francisco Public Defender’s Office bid farewell in 2016 to longtime Mo’ MAGIC Executive Director Sheryl Davis, who nurtured thousands of kids and families in the Western Addition. Mo’ MAGIC and its sister organization BMAGIC (which serves the Bayview) were initiated by the San Francisco Public Defender’s Office to address the root causes of juvenile crime. The programs convene more than 100 community organizations to provide health, educational, and recreational support to youth.

Voice For The Unheard

Public defenders like Niki Solis (pictured) provide zealous representation for the most vulnerable citizens. Jail inmates are more than four times as likely as non-incarcerated people to report having a disability, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics. Public defender clients struggle with poverty, and many battle addiction and homelessness.

A Final Argument

The closing argument is a public defender’s last chance to plead her client’s case. Public defenders like Dana Drusinsky (pictured) must summarize the evidence in both a coherent and persuasive way before the jury deliberates.

Celebrating Success
San Francisco public defenders like Kim Lutes-Koths (pictured) are dedicated to the pioneering San Francisco Collaborative Courts, which focus on treatment rather than punishment. These restorative justice courts cater to veterans, people with mental health issues, young adults, and those struggling with addiction.
